Olympic Fanfare and Theme

John Williams
(b. 1932)

Eminently successful as a composer, arranger, pianist and conductor, John Williams was commissioned to compose the “Olympic Fanfare and Theme” for the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles, conducting the work in its premier at the opening ceremonies. From the excitement of spirited trumpet flourishes and low brass pedals in the opening fanfare to the majestic, expansive “Olympic Theme” stated first in the strings and horns, the work exhibits Williams’s technical expertise and imagination as an orchestrator. Virtually synonymous today with the Olympics, the theme was incorporated in the closing ceremonies of the most recent Olympic Games in Vancouver. According to Williams, this music embodies “the spirit of cooperation, of heroic achievement, all the striving and preparation that go before the events and all the applause that comes after them.”

Má Vlast 2. Vltava (The Moldau)

Bedrich Smetana
(1824–1884)

The Bohemian-born composer Bedrich Smetana is commonly recognized as the father of Czech music because of his nationalistic musical style. In this ever-popular work in the symphonic repertoire, Smetana depicts the principal river of Bohemia, the Moldau (or Vltava in Czech). It is the second in a cycle of six patriotic tone poems in praise of the countryside, legends and history of Bohemia. Smetana dedicated the cycle to the city of Prague, its capital.

Smetana suggested an outline of the work that traces the course of the river from the two springs at its source to the city of Prague and beyond. As the work opens, two flutes play running notes to represent the swirling waters of the springs. Clarinets join in as the river widens and gains momentum before the strings take over with the lush main river theme. This beloved theme was long believed to be derived from a Czech folksong; however, research suggests its origin was actually a Swedish folksong. In its course, the ever-widening stream passes huntsmen on a chase, signaled by trumpet and horn calls; peasants celebrating a village wedding; and wood nymphs and water nymphs frolicking in the moonlight—and then it becomes part of the frenzied turbulence of the St. Johns rapids. Finally, after a brief restatement of the river theme, the Moldau, now at its fullest, flows majestically by the Vysehrad, the castle which overlooks the river at Prague.

William Tell Overture

Gioacchino Rossini
(1792–1868)

Highly successful and popular in his own day, Gioacchino Rossini composed his grand opera Guillaume Tell in 1829 at the age of 37. Although he would continue composing for nearly forty more years, this was his final opera. Because of its large scale and cumbersome libretto, the complete opera is rarely performed today. Rossini's overture, however, remains a staple in the orchestral repertoire and as a popular accompaniment in cartoons, films and television programs.

A play by Friedrich von Schiller served as a basis for the opera, which tells the story of Tell, the legendary Swiss hero who was forced to shoot an apple from his son's head. In four parts, the overture begins peacefully with a melody played by cellos and basses to depict a sunrise. A thunderstorm ensues, followed by a calm, pastoral English horn and flute duet. The finale of the work, the now-famous Lone Ranger theme, is signaled by a rousing trumpet call, after which the overture gallops on to an exciting conclusion: Hi ho, Silver, away!

Also sprach Zarathustra

Richard Strauss
(1864–1949)

Richard Strauss composed the tone poem Also sprach Zarathustra from February to August of 1896, and the work premiered in November of the same year with Strauss conducting. This work—along with two other tone poems, Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche (1894) and Don Juan (1888)—comprised his most important early successes and helped establish his reputation as gifted orchestrator. Although most listeners today recognize the introduction as the theme from Stanley Kubrick's 1968 film 2001: A Space Odyssey, Strauss based the entire work on a book by the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, with the tone poem's nine sections corresponding to chapters in Nietzsche's text. The impressive introduction, labeled "Dawn," begins powerfully with trumpets playing the ascending C-G-C motive which recurs throughout the work to symbolize nature.

– texts adapted from Psalm 27, 34 & 91

“Three Psalms” for chorus and orchestra, written in the nineties, had several performances, both here and elsewhere. When the opportunity came to write something for this concert, I again looked to the Psalms. I started in the setting of Psalm 91 but also kept reading and pondering and praying. Somehow there needed to be a new approach, a fresh perspective. And then I came upon Psalm 32:7 and the phrase “...Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance.” Here was the key for this new set. They would indeed be “songs,” not pieces intensely focused on the expansion and development of motives, on counterpoint or on textures, but “songs” for choir, cast in “song form,” the simplest of the compositional musical forms.

In song form, a lyric melody and its expansion are followed by a distinctly contrasting section, and then the original material returns. But here, the melody would underscore a great core truth from the Psalm so that the listener, hopefully remembering the tune, would also recapture that truth. This is what great hymn tunes do for us. Then came the idea to insert in each song the fragments of a familiar hymn tune whose text would match and expand the message of the Psalm. Listen closely and hear the hymn!

As the texts were chosen, I realized that they identified beautifully with the lives and testimonies of three of my long-time friends and colleagues here who had gone to be with the Lord. And so—three musical tributes. But what of shape and contrast, musical style and device, and all things analytical? They are always there, good, bad or inconclusive; but since these are “songs” for choir and orchestra they must be their own best explanation. God’s Word is ever powerful. A beautiful, memorable tune is a rare gem. So now, I tread on uncertain ground—for you, the listener, will decide this.

- III. Danse infernale du roi Kastcheï
- IV. Berceuse
- V. Finale

Igor Stravinsky composed his ballet The Firebird in 1910 and later, in 1911, arranged an orchestral suite based on the larger work. The composer would revise his suite twice, once in 1919 and again in 1945. The version performed tonight, the 1919 revision, is the most frequently performed. Both the original ballet and the 1919 orchestral suite are among Stravinsky's earliest works; as such, their colorful orchestration and distinctly "Russian" folk sound betray Stravinsky's allegiance to his teacher, Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov.

Just as the Phoenix symbolizes rebirth in classical mythology, so does the Firebird in Russian legend. In Stravinsky's musical tale, the Firebird helps the heroic Prince Ivan rescue princesses from the evil immortal magician Kastcheï. Stravinsky's rhythmic skill is evident in the violent and syncopated "Infernal Dance of King Kastcheï," which effectively depicts the brutal and sinister nature of the conjurer. The "Berceuse" (Lullaby) features a solo bassoon melody. In this movement the Firebird tells Prince Ivan how to break Kastcheï's spell and rescue the princesses. Stravinsky incorporated an authentic Russian folk song in the horn solo which begins the "Finale." This beautiful melody signals Ivan's success at freeing the princesses, killing the evil Kastcheï and wedding his Princess.
